How to Keep Warm.

In very cold weather most people have sense enough to build good fires and wear their thickest clothing; few, however, seem to know that physical warmth is created in the body itself, and all that fires or clothing can do is to prevent the warmth being seized too rapidly by the surrounding air. The best preparation for a comfortable day in very cold weather is to eat a generous breakfast, in which there shall be plenty of meat. There is far more warmth in an ounce of cold meat than in a pint of hot coffee, although the latter is to thousands of people the principle feature of the morning meal. A good appetite is necessary to a full breakfast, and it generally can be had by a five minute walk out of doors or a few minutes of light exercise in a freshly aired room—exercise such as the most delicate woman or child can indulge in without injury. Physical cleanliness, making free perspiration possible, is absolutely necessary to comfort in cold weather, and it can be attained, in spite of freezing cold bathrooms, by people who care enough for it to take extra trouble with a small quantity of water in a warm room. A glass of ardent liquor is a wretched preventive of cold. It will quicken the circulation for a few moments and diminish it for an hour after. The bulk to bread of a glass of beer is more warming than the liquor and only costs a quarter as much; the same comparison may be made between spirits and meat. It is almost impossible for a person who sits indoors all day to remain warm, but a few minutes out of doors, just long enough to have the system affected enough by the cold to rouse its powers of resistance, will insure a comfortable day thereafter if the house is fairly tight. It will be noticed that the lady who does her own marketing and the man who walks from his house to his place of business are the last to complain of the cold. If the above suggestions are acted upon and supplemented by an ample midday meal, no matter how plain, the weather's torments will soon be forgotten.—N. Y. Herald

How Teas are Adulterated.

It is pretty generally known that the orthodox teas prepared in the East for American and European consumption are adulterated, but comparatively few people are aware of the extent to which this adulteration is carried on, or what substances are used. M. Husson, a French chemist of note, has made a thorough investigation of the subject, and the result of his researches has been laid before the Academy of Sciences. He finds that Persian tea, Indian and ginseng, in small quantities, are the principal ingredients employed to impart the "face," or "bloom," to teas, and that the proportions used by the Europeans, who, with their
